

TYPES OF SENTENCES

Simple,
Compound and Complex
Sentences

Understanding Dependent & Independent Clauses

To distinguish between simple, complex, or compound sentences, it is important to know what independent and dependent clauses are.

Independent clause – can stand on its own as a sentence

Dependent clause – cannot stand on its own as a sentence

Sentences can be simple, complex, or compound

A simple sentence has one independent clause

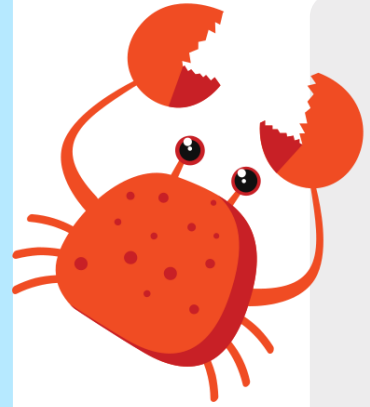

A complex sentence has one independent clause and one or more dependent clauses

A compound sentence joins two independent clauses

Simple Sentences

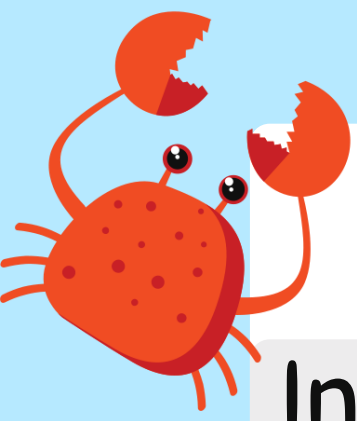

A simple sentence is the most basic type of sentence. This kind of sentence consists of just one independent clause, which means it communicates a complete thought and contains a subject and a verb.

A few examples of simple sentences include:

- How are you?
- She built a garden.
- We found some sea glass.

A simple sentence is the smallest possible grammatically correct sentence. Anything less is known as a sentence fragment.

Complex sentences

In contrast to a simple sentence, a complex sentence contains one independent clause and at least one dependent clause. While an independent clause can be its own sentence, a dependent clause can't.

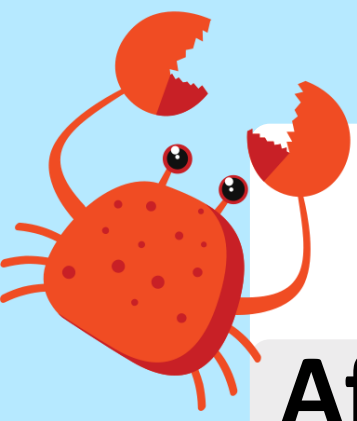

Dependent clauses rely on the independent clauses in their sentences to provide context.

Dependent clauses appear after a conjunction or marker word or before a comma. Marker words are words like whenever, although, since, while, and before. These words illustrate relationships between clauses.

The following are complex sentences:

- Before you enter my house, take off your shoes.
- Matt plays six different instruments, yet never performs in public.

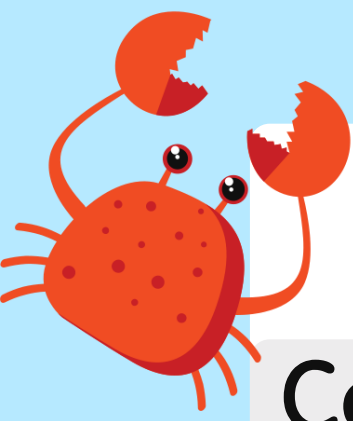

Subordinating Conjunctions in Complex sentences

After Although As
in order that
At least now that wherever
While Before
even though

how if
in as much
When Whenever whereas as though because even if though

Until Unless
as if
as long as
as much as soon
Since
so that
That
yet

Compound sentences

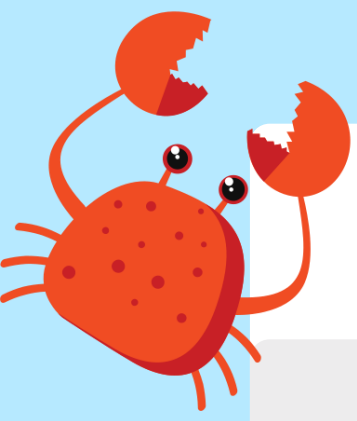

Compound sentences are sentences that contain two or more independent clauses. In a compound sentence, the clauses are generally separated by either a comma paired with a coordinating conjunction or a semicolon. In some cases, they can be separated by a colon.

Examples of compound sentences include:

- I was thirsty, so I drank water.
- She searched through her entire closet; she could not find her denim jacket.

How can you tell if you have a compound sentence? Swap out your semicolon, colon, or coordinating conjunction for a period. If you now have two distinct, complete sentences, you've got a compound sentence.

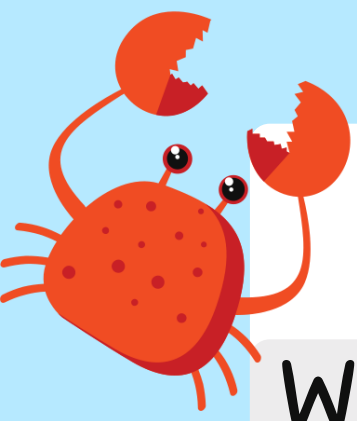

Note

A compound sentence contains two independent clauses.

Conjunctions (for, and, nor, but, or, and yet, so) join these independent clauses. (Hint: The conjunctions spell FANBOYS.)

The conjunction used can impact the meaning of the sentence.

Compound-complex

When a sentence has two or more independent clauses and at least one dependent clause, that sentence is a compound-complex sentence.

These are long sentences that communicate a significant amount of information. The clauses don't need to be in any specific order; as long as you've got at least two independent clauses and at least one dependent clause, you've got a compound-complex sentence.

Here are a few examples of compound-complex sentences:

- I needed a new computer, so I got a laptop because they're portable.
- The students were excited; they could go home early because of the power outage.

Are you ready for a compound- complex sentence?

It is more complex than a complex sentence! It has two or more independent clauses and at least one dependent clause.

Compound-Complex Sentence #1

Read this sentence. How many independent and dependent clauses can you see?

dependent clause

As soon as I heard the news that I qualified for the surfing competition, I called my parents, and we made plans to celebrate independent

clause #1

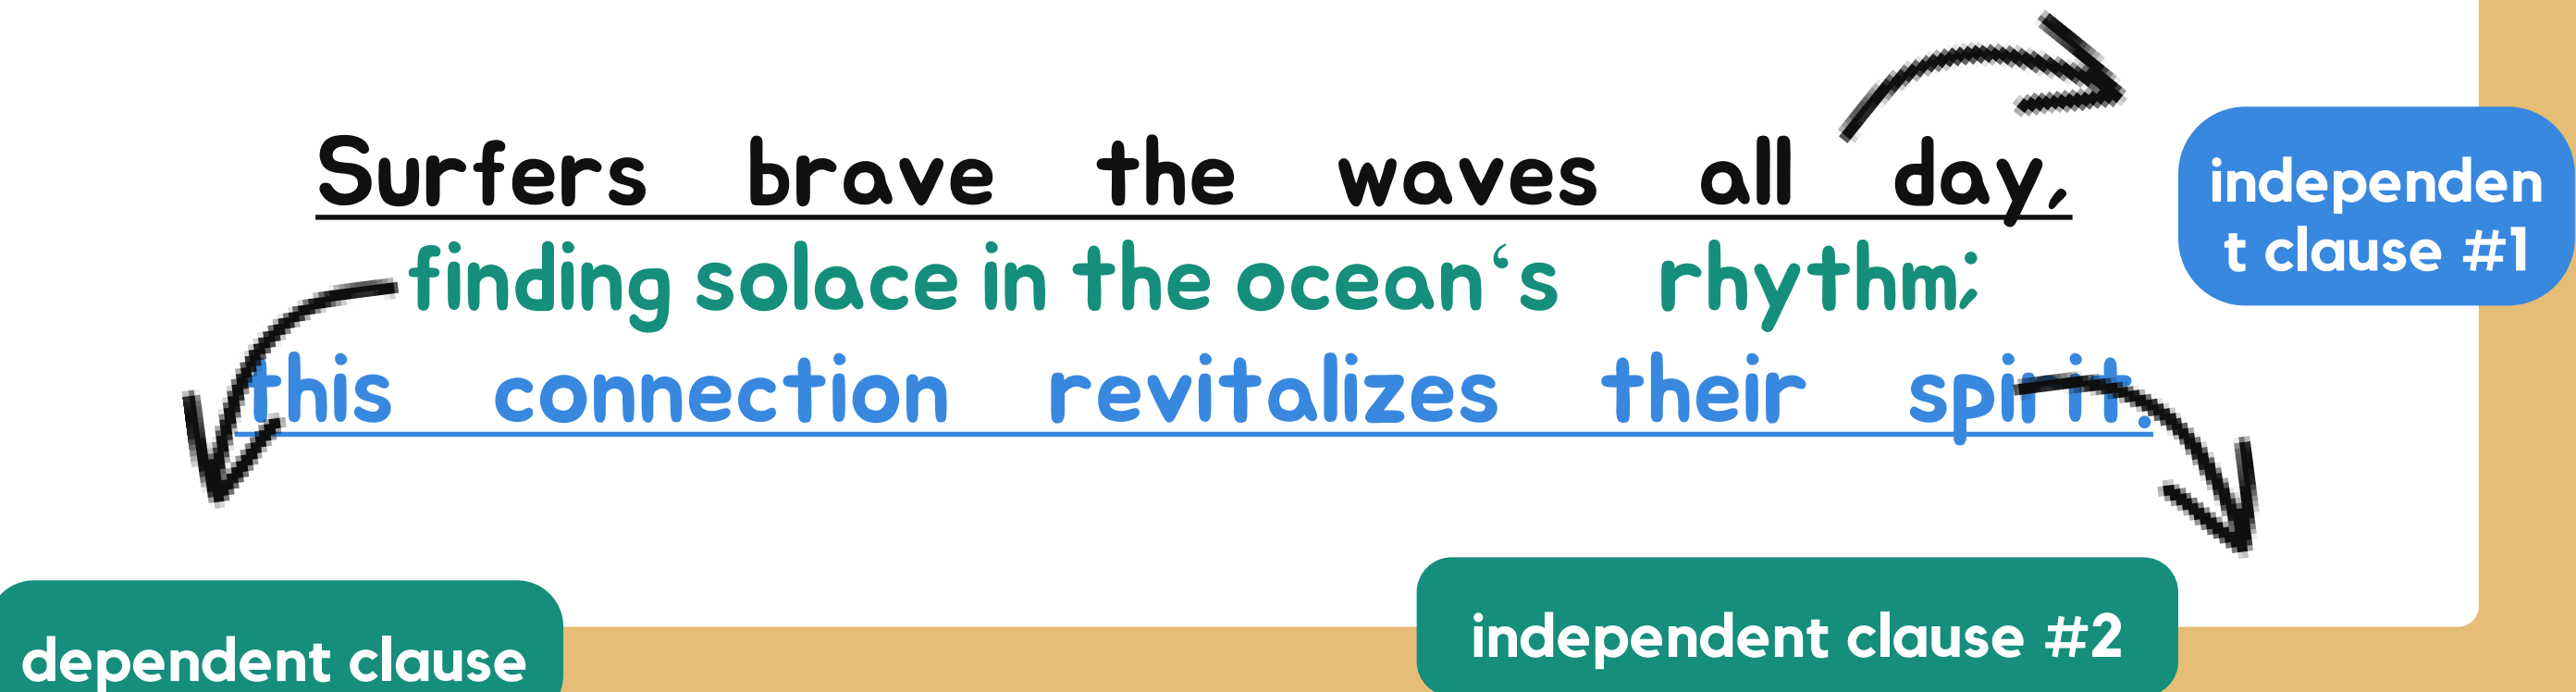

independent
clause #2

Compound-Complex Sentence #2

Surfers brave the waves all day,
finding solace in the ocean's rhythm;
this connection revitalizes their spirit.

Compound-complex sentences weave ideas together! Can you identify the clauses here?

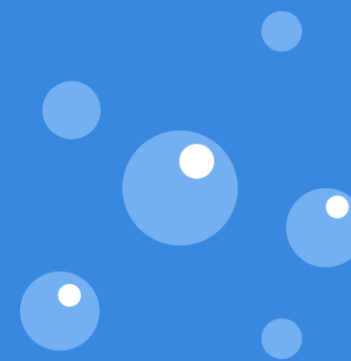

Compound-Complex Sentence #2

The goal of compound-complex sentences is to express complex relationships between ideas in a more connected way.

Here's our key takeaways!

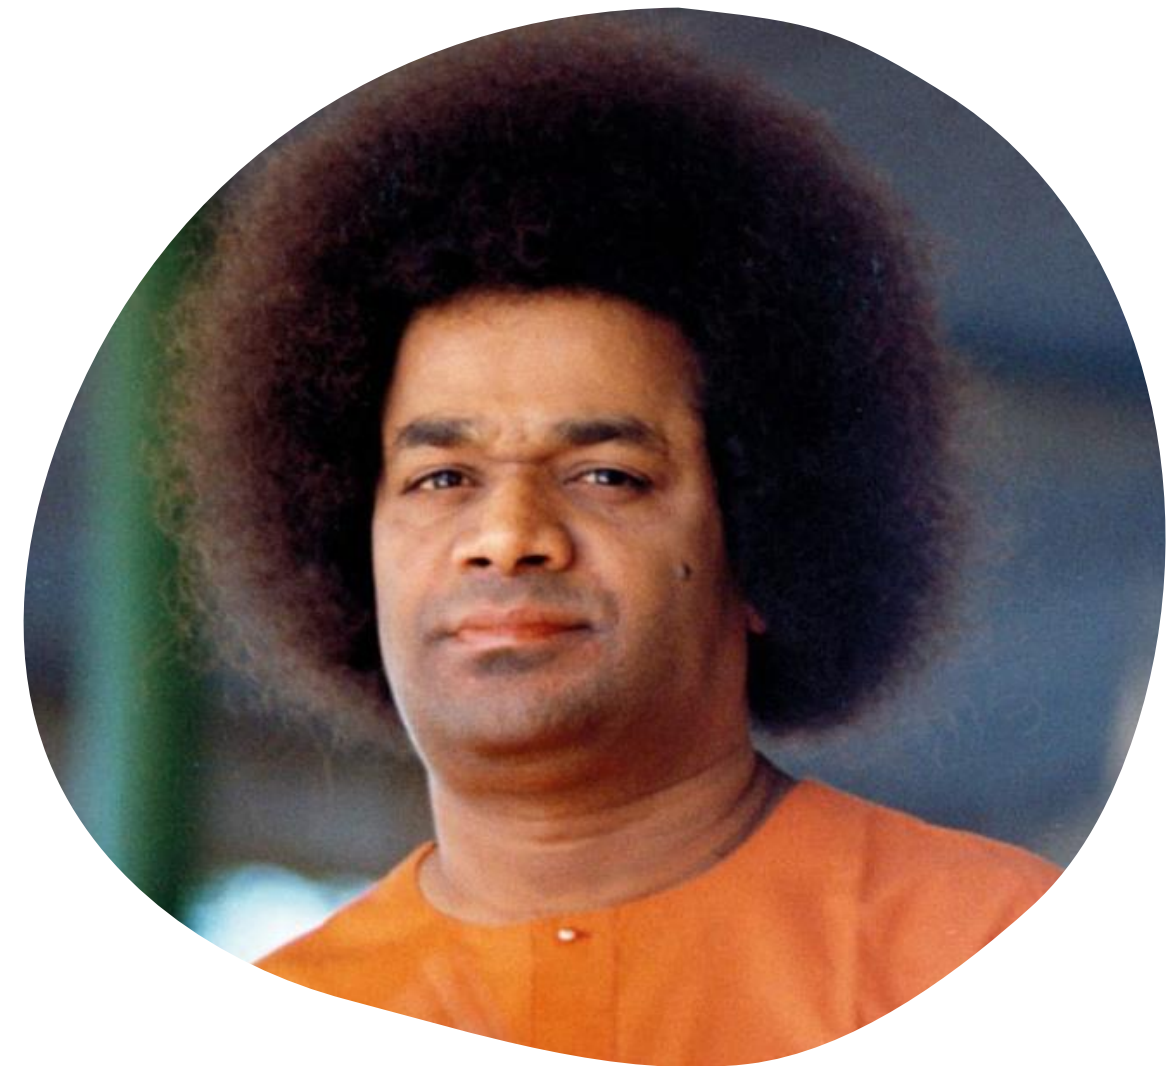

Complex sentences = Independent clause + Dependent clause

Compound-Complex sentences = 2 or more Independent clauses at least one Dependent clauses.

SAIRAM

References: : www.grammarly.com.